Gemini is a narrative that touches upon two themes to deliver its message: the theme of the unknown and the unheimlich and the theme of class-based prejudices. The first theme is evoked by Yukio's initial position in the narrative. Yukio vacillates between a wish to resolve the unknown that marks his wife and a wish to enjoy his marital life as it is and his wife in her current amnesiac state.

And the directors were really awesome in the fact that they understood what I was up against. We decided to shoot in sequence because we saw that the weather was going to arc in a pattern that felt like it would work with the continuity of the scene. The scene starts out overcast, then it goes to snow. Then it gets a little bit brighter back to overcast. And then it goes to full on sun, but ...

Suggested instead by the cinematography, with its tendency to place characters in windswept fields and to keep the edges of the frame fuzzy, one feels the details around these characters blurring, the focus only ever on their own little goings-on. In a strange way, this evokes our own focus, our tendency to be myopic about our times and to lose sight of both the past and the future. The lonely ...

Before auteur theory, Directors were important, but the other factors were still more significant. Stars. Studios. Producers. People referred to a 'Clark Gable movie' for example, because in the 1930's stars ruled the day. Auteur theory came in the early 1950's, and it changed all that. It shifted some power away from actors, producers, and studio moguls. It shifted power towards ...
